Webster as an orthographic conservative?

ll languagelog.idc.upenn.edu • Matthew Edney, who describes himself as "a British-born academic who now, 27 years after first arrival, is linguistically located somewhere in the general confusion of the mid-Atlantic", sent me an interesting query about the history of English spelling. Since I know almost nothing about this subject, I'm forwarding the question to LL readers, who are likely among them to have the answers, or at least some useful observations.

My query is prompted by an article in today's Guardian: Sarah Churchwell, "English: it's a neologism thang, innit", 5/9/2010.

"Critical Pessimism" Revisted: An Open Letter to Adam Fish

📧 henryjenkins.org • A few weeks ago, Adam Fish called me out through his blog, Savage Minds, for what he saw as a harsh and unfair representation of the Media Reform movement in the final paragraphs of my book, Convergence Culture: Where Old and New Media Collide. He did so for the most part by simply reprinting my own words to frame a story he wrote about the recent Media Reform conference.

I was a bit surprised to find myself singled out as an enemy of the Media Reform movement. If I am the biggest obstacle to your success, you are much closer to victory than I had previously imagined. :-)

The experience was uncomfortable for me, but in a very constructive way, in that it ...

Don't try this at home

T languageblog.ldc.upenn.edu • Following up on my posts about locative denominal verbs, yesterday's SMBC: Without professional guidance, that kind of exploration could go off in all kinds of directions: And instead of emerging with some sensible conclusion ("...the bieventive analysis can form a basis for a unified theory of causativization across languages while the theta-role analysis cannot..."), you could wind up who knows where...
